

Asking and Divulging Personal Information

I like to talk with my co-workers during breaks. There are lots of topics to discuss that can help us get to know one another better.

There are some topics that are too personal to discuss at work with a co-worker. For example, it is not okay to talk about politics, religion, sex, and personal problems at work. If I talk about these things, my co-workers will feel weird, and they might not want to talk with me as much. If I ask them questions about these kinds of topics, they will think I am being rude or nosey.

There are many things we can talk about, such as weekend plans, movies, TV shows, music, and work-related topics. They would feel more comfortable talking about these kinds of things.

*To avoid accidentally sharing private personal information with co-workers, I can always refer to my "Sharing personal information reminder card."